WMUL-FM

Public radio station to increase wattage, listening range 17 times

At 6 a.m. Monday, Feb. 9, West Virginia's oldest public radio station—Marshall University's radio station WMUL-FM—will boost its power from 10 watts to 176 watts, increasing its listening range 17 times, according to Station Manager Keith Spears.

"Currently WMUL-FM's signal can be heard only within a two air mile radius of campus, but the additional power means listeners within a 10 air mile radius should be able to receive the student-operated non-commercial station on 88.1 Mhz," Spears said.

"No longer will their audience be limited to dormitory residents, but should include listeners throughout Huntington, as far east as Barboursville and Ona, over in Ohio in South Point and Proctorville, and into Kentucky along the fringes of Ashland," Spears explained.

"A larger transmitter, a new antenna and Federal Communications Commission approval have enabled us to take this step as the station prepares to celebrate its 20th anniversary later this year," Spears said.

According to MU Speech Department Chairman Dorothy Johnson the power increase will be a tremendous boost to the students. "Funded by student activity fees, WMUL-FM is much more than a lab experience for broadcasting students. It also provides special services to the student body—programming for students," she noted. "In fact, those 96 who voluntarily staff the station are not even all broadcasting majors, but represent a wide variety of majors from across the entire campus," she added.

"Being heard by a larger community will mean an increase in student responsibility," Spears commented.
