MU journalism school dedicates room to media icon, alumus

By TESSA WOOTEN

The W. P. Fitt School of Journalism and Mass Communications held their dedication ceremony of the Marvin L. Stone Reading Room on Friday morning.

Faculty, staff, students and family of Marvin Stone attended the event, honoring the man who was famous for being the long-time editor of U.S. News and World Report.

George Arnold was a colleague of Marvin Stone's, and was one of the speakers at the event. He said most people would consider Stone the number one graduate of the journalism program.

"We have these special areas in memory of Marvin Stone because we want students to have special feelings about this program." Arnold said.

Along with the reading room in the Fitt School, there is also a library in Smith Hall, room 330, in honor of Marvin Stone.

The reading room contains Stone’s life work including articles he wrote, his press passes, photographs and certificates such as his diploma from the Missouri School of Journalism.

The room also has digital access for students to use.

Students not only have a place to conduct research or do their own journalism assignments, but they can also learn about the accomplished journalist who made a big impact on the university.

Michael Clark, a cousin of Marvin Stone, also spoke at the event and said those areas are more than just study rooms for students.

"They are a tribute to the memory of an accomplished journalist," Clark said.

Juniour Stone, Stone’s daughter said at 16-years-old her father knew he wanted to be a journalist and an editor. She served in both of those aspects.

"She told me how her father was always reading books and newspapers."

McGovern was a die-hard ideologue who abandoned his optimism or his moral fervor against President Richard M. Nixon and the Vietnam War but lost in a land state-by-state defeat in U.S. history.

In 2000, Clinton nominated McGovern for the distinguished Service Medal because of his years in public service. In 1974, McGovern was re-elected to the Senate.

In 1974, McGovern ran again for presi- dency, preaching a revolutionary liberal message.

When he failed to place second in the Massachusetts primary, the only state that had voted for him 12 years before, he withdrew.

In 2000, Clinton nominated McGovern for the Presidential Medal of Free- dom, the nation’s highest civilian honor. A year later, the US. Congress passed legislation that would prevent him from ever being nominated for the presidency again.

Interest in South America could be too little, too late

By JULIA GREENWALD

ANDREW WITTMAN

Hugo Chávez was re-elected president of Venezuela, a position he has held for 13 years, on Oct. 7. This election not only has grand implications on Venezuela and South America but also on the United States. Nevertheless, this significant event has seen little attention from both the U.S. media and its citizens. In a phone call aired on state-run television around mid-evening during voting day, Chávez said these elections “will be a triumph for democracy” and asked that there be no violence. However, all the attention Chávez and Venezuela received from the U.S. media, specifically the television system, is a testament to Capriles’ campaign and events.

Although there is no concrete evidence that corruption took place, there are indicators of Chávez’s unfair advantage. Capriles, Chávez’s opponent, was not able to receive the elected president’s use of the country’s oil money as bribes to gain support in the form of ‘vote-buying’ through press advertisements targeted at the poor.

“The use of state funds for this kind of electioneering is driving Venezuela's budget deficit for the year to an astounding level of 20 percent of GDP,” an incredible figure for an oil-exporting economy at a time of very high oil prices,” Capriles said.

As Americans, we have to pay attention to the lack of democracy and freedom that the Chávez regime is trying to develop. Other countries in South America are following his lead, promising their citizens a better life, but in reality, it is next to impossible for voters to vote for the candidate they want. If they do so, it is possible for voters to vote for the candidate’s stance about an issue of government and from there make a reasonable decision of who to vote for. For example, the debate about clean coal actually boils down to a debate about the size of government.

But what actually is clean coal and why are we hearing about it?

At the first presidential debate Oct. 3, with my natural economic inclinations, I was surprised at how much time and energy both candidates spent discussing the future of energy. This is a valid debate, but I also agree with El Paso Republican candidate Mitt Romney that-solving energy problems should be able with.

Romney’s plan to promote research and investment in green energy. He plans to promote research and investment in green energy, including clean coal technology, and regulations on harmful energy production.

This belief calls for the federal government to take responsibility for the public health of its citizens, who may suffer from lung problems, heart disease, and cancer.

However, when looking at the candidates, I believe Obama’s stance on clean coal actually boils down to a debate about the size of government.

Democrats: The President doesn’t control gas prices you crazy people!

After the Debate:

Democrats: How wonderful, President Obama is lowering the prices to help hard-working Americans!

Republicans: The President doesn’t control gas prices you crazy people!

We have seen the President promise to lower gas prices to one vote over a tax vote—so we can cross the border into Ohio and get gas 40-50 cents cheaper per gallon than here in the Mountain State.

Now, this is not the first time gas has been significantly cheaper in the United States. In the other two members of the Tri-State area residents, we should see a bit of that gas that has shot back down so drastically on our local gas stations. We may find that our interest in the region is too little, too late. We may find that our interest in the region is too little, too late.

MAGICAL WORLD CASTS SPELL ON HUNTINGTON MUSEUM OF ART

By SARAH SMITH

The Huntington Museum of Art will host a Harry Potter and the Permanent Collection Tour on Tuesday from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. The HMA hosts a themed tour, including refreshments on the fourth Tuesday of every month.

“All of the fourth Tuesday tours are marketed to an adult crowd,” however some of the themes certainly cross the age,” Cindy Dearborn, museum and school’s coordinator, said.

Dearborn said the Harry Potter tour will include several exhibits with Harry Potter-related items, excerpts of the Harry Potter books being read. Herbology and Potions will be discussed in the Conservatory and wizard duels will be centered in relation to HMA’s dueling pistols.

This is the second year the HMA has conducted the Harry Potter tour. Ruth Ann Burke, weekend receptionist at HMA, was at the tour last year.

“Last year was nothing but laughter; enjoyment and pride as dozens of and young were guided visitors through the museum, reading passages from the various Harry Potter novels and relating them back to different galleries and art in the museum, breathing life into each and creating a beautiful synergy of art and literature,” Burke said.

Burke said everyone can enjoy this tour.

“The beautiful thing about every fourth Tuesday tour is the variety of subject matter and chance so that anyone, regardless of age or interest, would enjoy the tour,” Burke said. “They are educational, engaging and a wonderful opportunity to learn about art and the museum in your community in a relaxed, enjoyable atmosphere. No knowledge of the world of Harry Potter or the world of art is needed to be swept away in the beauty and invocating wait to magically appear at the museum.”

Refreshments including Bertie Butt’s Every Flavor Beans and Butterbeer will be served. Costumes are recommended, but not required. Admission is free.
